Successful organizations know that negative conflict within an organization creates morale problems, slowdowns in work and employee dissatisfaction. Often, conflict in the workplace arises as a result of differences in personalities and approaches to solving problems and accomplishing goals.

In this highly practical seminar, participants gain a deeper understanding of their own behavioral tendencies in times of conflict through the use of the Thomas-Kilmann Conflict Mode Instrument (TKI) — perhaps the most robust self-assessment in this field. This tool helps people become more aware of their own personality traits and preferences, and enables them to more easily view the traits and preferences of others they work with. Mutual understanding, along with the development of empathy for one another, is absolutely key to effective relationships that continue to yield outstanding organizational results in today's demanding, fast-moving and highly diverse workplace.

Everyone is needed — analytical thinkers, creative thinkers, people who hone in on the details and people who stand back to see the big picture. When people truly comprehend their differences need not lead to conflict and that not all conflict is bad... the workplace can yield greater creativity and collegiality. Participants often mention their relationships outside of work were also improved by applying the lessons learned from this seminar!
