Time management is still one of the most Googled professional development subjects today. Wouldn't you think with all this technology and these planning systems we would have mastered the art of managing time by now? It seems not.

In this busy world where the noise seems to increase every day, it's vitally important that we're clear on our highest priorities and that we manage our energy throughout the day; that we plan weekly and prioritize daily. We must execute best practices consistently to better manage emails, phones, interruptions, overcome procrastination, and be able to contribute to and run effective meetings. In short, we need to be more focused than ever.

This seminar is based on common sense approaches to common time management problems — methods that really work in today's workplace. Participants will review case studies that amplify the dramatic impact of not managing time well and the whole-life benefits of managing this precious resource we call time.
